Three Things You Should Know Before You Speak To The IRS

Do you have Tax Problems?

Some people have lost everything, their business, their homes, and sometimes their families. But, it doesn't have to be that way. The worst part about IRS problems is not knowing what the IRS is going to do to you, or your business. That's why I choose to try to help people with IRS problems.

If you have a tax problem there are three things you should know before you speak to anyone at the IRS.

First, never voluntarily tell an IRS employee anything, unless they specifically ask for the information. This tip is extremely important for you to understand.

Only provide the IRS
the information they ask for, and nothing more.

And, be careful. The IRS counts on taxpayers giving up too much information. So, don't become friendly with an IRS employee or offer more information than is necessary. And remember, not everything is necessary.

You should also know that you have a right to say nothing to the IRS. You can have an attorney talk to them instead. So, don't be afraid to stop talking and stop providing information to the IRS, at any time.

If you are concerned or scared, just let them know you want to hire an attorney. Politely refuse to answer any more questions, or provide any more information until after you have met with a legal professional.

Second, never tell the IRS something you know is not true. Lying to an employee of the IRS is against the law. If the IRS catches you in a lie you may be charged with perjury. And, if you think the IRS won't find out. Think again. You are taking a chance with your freedom.

And third, you should never answer any question from an IRS employee unless you understand it completely.

If you are not absolutely sure about how to answer their questions you should let them know that you don't know, or you can't recall, or you're not sure. This is important, because down the road the IRS will not be willing to negotiate or discuss forgiving any taxes, penalties or interest that you owe if they believe that you have not been completely up front with them.

IRS problems are a serious business and they need serious attention.

To help you or someone you know I offer a free initial consultation to anyone with an IRS problem. It could be a personal problem or a business problem.

This consultation will be with me, in my office, and it will be completely confidential. We will talk about your particular situation in detail and then we will discuss possible solutions to your IRS problem. So, you can stop worrying about the unknown.
